Quantitative Trait Loci (QTL) mapping is a method for identifying the genomic location of genes that control a quantitative trait. It is based on the principle that the frequency of recombination between a marker and a gene is proportional to the distance between them. The first step in QTL mapping is to identify a trait that is quantitative and heritable. This is often done by measuring the trait in a population of individuals that are genetically diverse. The next step is to identify markers that are linked to the trait. This is done by comparing the trait values of individuals with their marker genotypes. The final step is to map the QTLs. This is done by using statistical methods to identify the genomic regions that are associated with the trait. QTL mapping has many applications in plant and animal breeding, as well as in the study of complex diseases. It is a powerful tool for understanding the genetic architecture of quantitative traits.
